What factors influenced results

U.S. equities delivered solid returns in 2025, supported by strong gains from growth sectors. The S&P 500 Index climbed to record highs, driven by resilient consumer spending and expanded corporate investment in AI infrastructure. Moderating inflation and labor market softness prompted the U.S. Federal Reserve to deliver three 25-basis-point rate cuts during the year.

Within the fund, each sector contributed positively to overall portfolio return, with information technology, industrials and financials being particularly additive, despite weakness in some financials holdings. Additionally, holdings in communication services, utilities and real estate all saw returns surpass those of the overall portfolio. The consumer staples and health care sectors posted double-digit gains but trailed the portfolio's total return.

Conversely, holdings in energy, materials and consumer discretionary provided minimal contributions to total return.
