What factors influenced results

The U.S. economy maintained steady growth during most of the fund's fiscal year but contracted in the first quarter of 2025 due to escalating tariff tensions and weaker consumer sentiment. The Federal Reserve cut rates three times in 2024 as inflation eased. U.S. indices posted strong returns during the period despite heightened economic uncertainties and a market correction in early 2025. Financials and utilities were the top-performing sectors, driven by interest rate changes and increased electricity demand from data centers, respectively.

Within the fund, most sectors added positive returns to the overall portfolio, with information technology, financials and consumer staples particularly additive. Select holdings in utilities and industrials also saw returns surpassing those of the overall portfolio. The industrials and consumer discretionary sectors posted double-digit gains but trailed the portfolio's total return. Conversely, the fund's holdings in the energy and materials sectors saw negative returns during the period.
